INTRODUCTION

Ballynure Historical Group was formed in 1997 by Ballynure and District Community Association with the purpose of researching and preserving the village history. Part of the group's work has entailed the mapping and recording of the headstone inscriptions in the local graveyard with periodic updating. Members have also advised and worked with the local Council in various preservation, environmental and tourism projects associated with the graveyard.

The latest project has culminated in the photographing and placing of the headstone inscriptions in a searchable database to facilitate those interested in genealogical research. We also record our thanks to the Ulster Historical Foundation for allowing us to include the data from the small number of headstones that are no longer visible in the graveyard. In the new map, the plot numbers go in bands from left to right and top to bottom, but the grid lines are no longer present. An archaeological survey in connection with the recent A8 road bypass to the village has dated the site of the graveyard to Early Christian times.

Little now remains of the old church that once stood within the graveyard next to which are the vaults of the landed gentry. One vault, with a steeply pitched stone roof, belongs to the Dobbs family, the earlier two are barrel vaulted, one belonging to the Dobbs family and the other to the Ellis family of Straid and Prospect. There is a corpse house at the entrance to the graveyard dating back to the days of the body snatchers.

Jonathan Swift who wrote Gulliver's Travels was once rector for Ballynure and is said to have preached at this location. There are over 400 plots within the graveyard with the earliest headstone being 1628 for Ellinor Clements, a supposed ancestor of Samuel Langhorne Clemens aka Mark Twain.

Other notable graves include those of the Rev Adam Hill, the Presbyterian Minister who was sympathetic to the United Irishmen as well as the ancestors of General Alexander Macomb the famous American hero from the war of 1812.

While every effort has been made to ensure the accuracy of the information, this booklet gives the data that has been transcribed from the headstones.

Please report any errors so that they can be passed on to Stephen Bell or Richard Wallace, to whom we give our thanks for their work in the creation of the computer database and associated map.

Copies of a headstone photograph may be obtained by quoting the grave number and emailing lookup@nifhs.org
